The following information was obtained from the records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation:

On June 10, 1964, the "New York Times" reported that the United States had received information from its intelligence sources that the Soviet Union had agreed to sell to Cuba a large quantity of military equipment, including tanks, aircraft, and missiles.

This report was widely publicized and caused considerable concern among American officials and the general public. The Soviet Union's alleged agreement to supply Cuba with advanced weapons was seen as a major escalation of the Cold War and a direct challenge to U.S. interests in the Western Hemisphere.

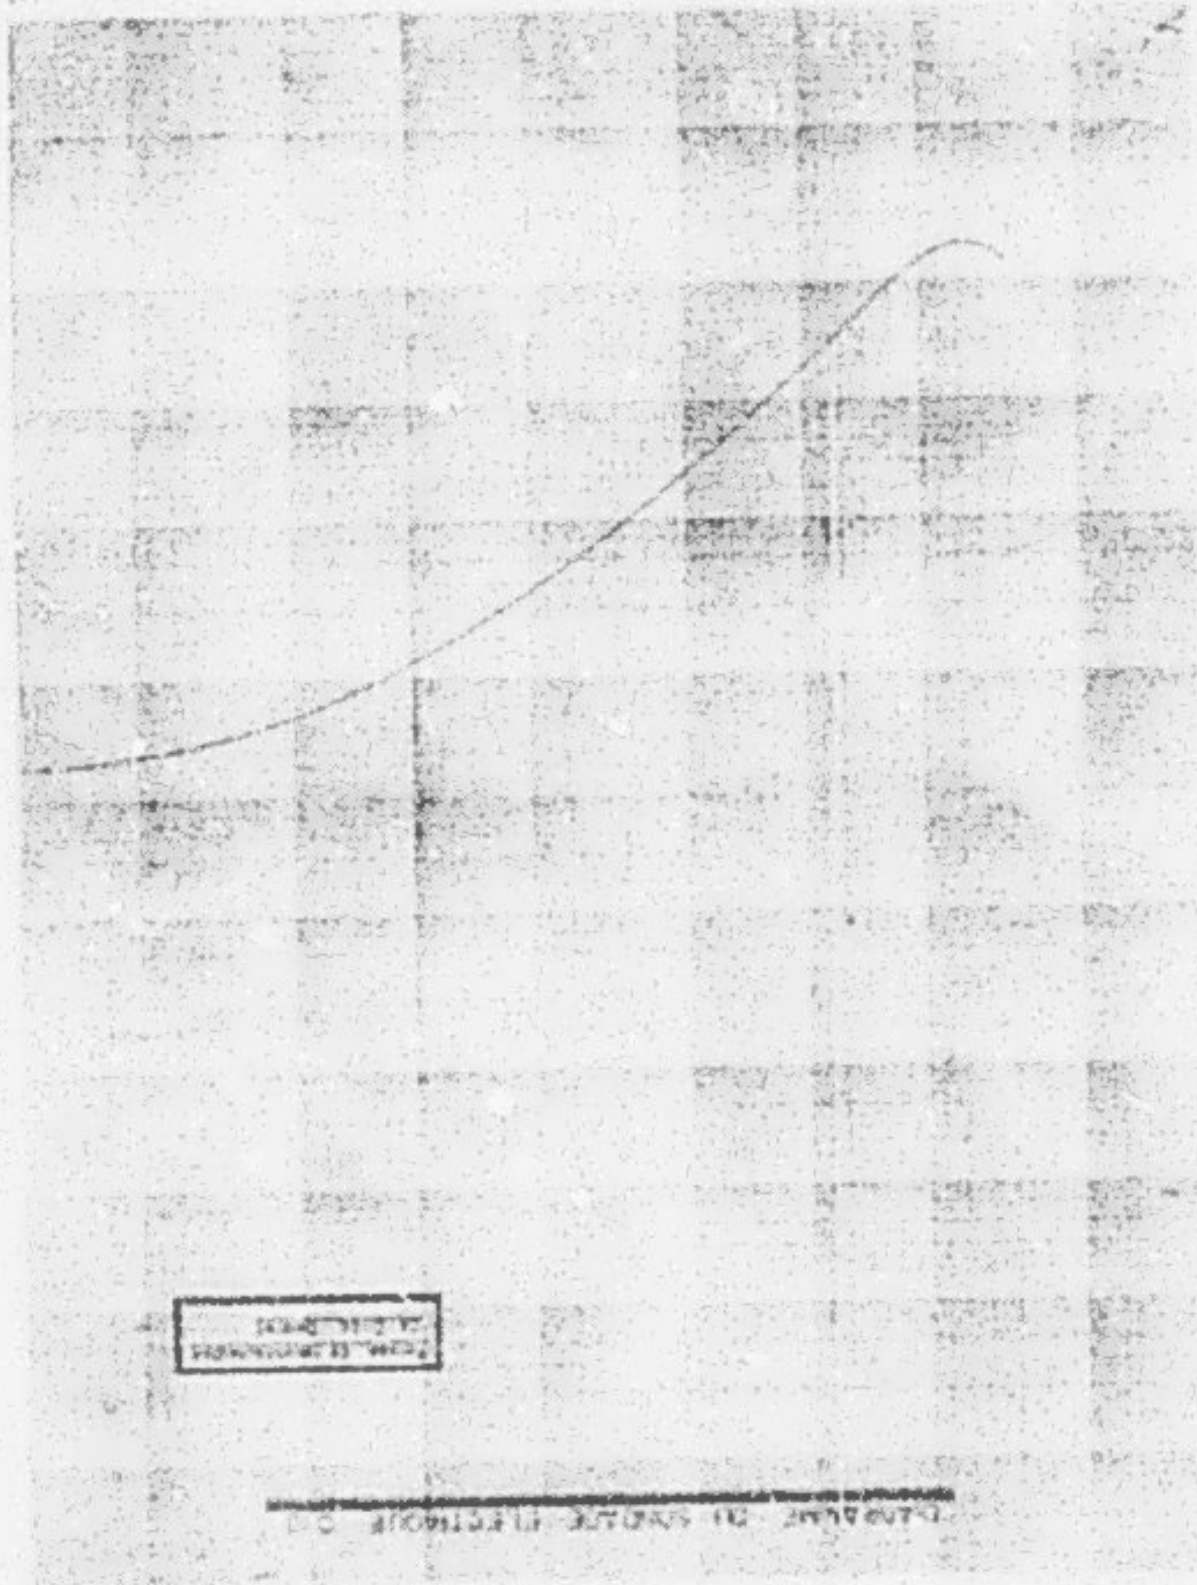

In response to this news, the United States government took several steps to strengthen its defense posture and to signal its opposition to the arms transfer. These actions included increasing military spending, accelerating the development of new weapons systems, and imposing economic sanctions on the Soviet Union.

The incident also led to renewed discussions about the possibility of nuclear war between the superpowers. Many Americans expressed fears that the availability of such powerful weapons could lead to their misuse or accidental detonation.

Overall, the revelation of the Soviet-Cuban arms deal served as a stark reminder of the global tensions of the era and underscored the need for continued vigilance and diplomatic efforts to prevent conflict.
